The Santa Claus Rally: A Seasonal Signal, Not a Strategy

Joe Shearrer, CPFA® is Vice President and Wealth Advisor at Fervent Wealth Management.

Every December, as holiday parties fill the calendar and year-end checklists get shorter, the stock market picks up a familiar storyline: the Santa Claus Rally. You'll hear it mentioned on financial news channels and in market commentaries, usually with a mix of optimism and skepticism. Some investors swear by it. Others dismiss it as folklore. As with most things in investing, the truth sits somewhere in the middle. So what is the Santa Claus Rally, and should investors pay attention as we close out 2025?

The Santa Claus Rally refers to a historical tendency for stock prices to rise during a very specific period: the last five trading days of December and the first two trading days of January. This isn't a recent invention. The term dates back to the 1970s, when market historian Yale Hirsch observed that stocks often performed better than average during this short year-end window. Over time, the idea stuck and became part of the market's seasonal vocabulary.

Importantly, the Santa Claus Rally does not mean the market goes up every December, nor does it suggest guaranteed gains. It's simply a pattern that has shown up often enough over many decades to be worth noting.

Looking at long-term market data, the Santa Claus Rally has occurred roughly three out of every four years, with average returns during that seven-day stretch typically around 1% to 1.5%. That may not sound dramatic, but over such a short period, it's meaningfully higher than normal. Of course, history also shows plenty of exceptions.

In years marked by recessions, financial stress, or major uncertainty, Santa has skipped Wall Street altogether. Recent decades have also seen the effect become less consistent as markets have grown more efficient. That's why most professionals view the Santa Claus Rally not as a prediction, but as a sentiment gauge, a way to take the market's emotional temperature as one year ends and another begins.

There's no single explanation, but a few factors tend to show up each year. By late December, much of the selling of losing investments to reduce taxes has run its course. Trading volumes are lighter as many institutional investors step away for the holidays. At the same time, optimism tends to creep in; earnings are largely known, big policy decisions are often on pause, and investors begin looking ahead to the new year. Put together, those conditions can create a modest upward bias. Not always — but often enough to earn the rally its name.

As we head into the final weeks of 2025, the backdrop is familiar: cautious optimism mixed with legitimate uncertainty. Investors are watching interest rates closely, hoping for a more favorable policy environment. Inflation has cooled from its highs, but concerns around valuations, economic growth, and geopolitical risk remain very real.

In other words, this is not an environment where a calendar effect alone will determine market direction. Could we see a Santa Claus Rally this year? Possibly. History suggests the odds lean that way, but whether it shows up or not shouldn't drive major financial decisions.

Seasonal trends like the Santa Claus Rally are interesting, and they make for good headlines. But they are no substitute for a well-thought-out financial plan. Long-term investing success is still built on fundamentals: diversification, appropriate risk, discipline during volatile periods, and a focus on goals rather than short-term market moves.

If Santa brings a little cheer to the markets this year, that's a bonus. If not, it's a reminder that markets don't move on tradition, they move on expectations, data, and human behavior. Either way, the smartest move is the same one investors should make every season: stay focused on the plan, not the noise.

Have a blessed week!

Innovating for the Planet Through Environmental Education

Environmental innovation begins with education, and new tools for New York and New Jersey teachers can help.

(NAPSI)—Here’s something students, parents and teachers in New York and New Jersey may be glad to learn: A group of experts has come up with a way to make environmental education easier for students to understand—and to act on.

This first-of-its-kind effort, called the Environmental Education Initiative (EEI), helps students engage in environment science, and make informed decisions that support healthy environments.

Powered by worldwide edtech leader Discovery Education, the Environmental Education Initiative supports civic engagement with standards-aligned resources that explore contemporary topics in environmental studies.

Who is Involved?

Experts at Stanford University carefully reviewed a body of academic literature over 20 years to measure the effect of environmental education for K-12 students. Then the National Environmental Education Foundation, Nucor, Honeywell, Itron, LyondellBasell, Subaru of America, Inc., and Niagara Cares all helped create the Environmental Education Initiative alongside Discovery Education.

Why Environmental Education?

Research by the North American Association of Environmental Education reveals that environmental education helps students:

- improve overall academic performance
- enhance critical thinking skills
- develop personal growth and life-building skills

What Do the Students Learn?

Topics include energy, forestry, clean water and region-specific content through Excursion Across America, a series of five animated videos and ready-to-use activities introducing students to regional facts and environmental topics. The accompanying educator resources and activities showcase how students can have a positive effect on the planet.

Why NY and NJ?

The New York Board of Regents has made education on the environment a requirement for high school graduation. The Environmental Education Initiative curriculum, which can be integrated into existing courses or be a stand-alone course, teaches students about an array of topics related to the environment.

New Jersey integrates environmental education into K-12 across all subjects (Science, ELA, Math, Arts, etc.) through mandated standards (NJSLs) and resources from the NJDOE and the NJ Climate Education Hub. The state offers professional development workshops and webinars to help teachers integrate concepts including greenhouse effects, sea-level rise, and local effects, sample lessons, and support for districts, aiming to build climate literacy and resilience, preparing students for a clean economy, with initiatives also from groups such as This Is Planet Ed.

It all leads to a roadmap that helps schools take action, adapt, and educate on climate change.

How it Works:

Standards-Based: Resources align with NJ Student Learning Standards (NJSLs).

Teacher-Focused: Provides tools (guides, activities, supply kits) for teachers in elementary, middle, and high school.

Community & Resilience: Aims to connect learning to local impacts (like flooding) and build school sustainability.

How To Get It

All the standards-aligned resources are available to K-12 educators and students at environmentaleducationinitiative.com
