Earnings Growth Broadens Beyond AI as Markets Enter a High Bar Quarter

Natalie Garrison, MBA, Investment Committee Researcher at Fervent Wealth Management

I still remember the house on our street that passed out king-sized candy bars when I was growing up. You had to get there early, but stopping by that neighbor's house was one of the things I looked forward to most. Still, no Halloween haul was complete without a wide array of chocolate and gummy candies to sort through at the end of the night. Many times, I got candy varieties I enjoyed even more than the king-sized candy bar.

I see a similar story shaping up with a variety of earnings expectations from sectors beyond those rooted in artificial intelligence (AI). AI may still be the king-sized candy bar everyone rushes toward, but this quarter, the variety from non-AI sectors is proving surprisingly satisfying.

As third-quarter earnings results start crossing headlines, corporations face high expectations to beat. Interestingly, market segments not rooted in AI infrastructure are starting to show a strong foundation. That's not to say AI isn't the main engine driving projected growth this quarter, but it makes a strong case for long-term investors with diversified portfolios.

One of the primary indicators of economic growth is inflation-adjusted gross domestic product (GDP), which is projected to grow by more than 3% in the third quarter. This is up sharply from the 1.8% growth forecasted for the second quarter. These figures support the positive earnings outlook in the non-AI sectors. The same sectors are projected to post earnings above 17%, and potentially higher given rising GDP projections.

This makes the 2026 third-quarter earnings season especially unique, given how high the bar has been set. In the S&P 500, 41% of companies that provided data raised their earnings estimates, the highest positive guidance ratio in over 5 years. This raises the question of whether high earnings estimates increase the likelihood of earnings disappointment in a quarter; research shows they do not. Since 2012, the best quarter returns followed strong positive guidance ratios, and the weakest followed quarters where the bar was set low.

What does this mean for the long-term diversified investor? This broadening growth across sectors matters, especially in a market where investors want confirmation that growth isn't centered in a single sector. Even though AI Infrastructure and cloud computing remain the primary driver of equity growth, investors may begin to see other sectors in their equity holdings provide a strong foundation for long-term market performance alongside the growing tech landscape. A diversified portfolio can capture the benefits of these non-AI sectors while also benefiting from technology and tech-related infrastructure performance in the coming months. As more earnings reports roll in, investors will watch whether non-AI sectors deliver the growth they forecast and sustain that momentum into the fourth quarter.

Just like that Halloween haul, the value isn't only in the king-sized candy bar but, rather, in the variety. This quarter's earnings suggest the mix may be getting richer. While I don't go door to door looking for king-sized candy bars anymore, I'll still enjoy the smiles they bring to faces across the neighborhood as children sort through their assortment of goodies on Halloween night.

Have a blessed week!

Natalie Garrison
